Not illustrated. 1916 Excerpt: .treatment of cancer.-Cancer destroys half as many lives every year in the United States as does tuberculosis and it appears to be a greater danger, because the latter is on the decrease from year to year, while cancer steadily increases. Cancer is a disease of our highly developed civilization and, like death itself, it loves a shining mark. It seldom strikes the vicious, the uncleanly poor, but at those lives that promise most to themselves and their community. It is not common in prisons and asylums. Married women are more frequently affected than the unmarried, fertile women than barren. This prevalence of cancer among the most highly civilized peoples may be accounted for by the fact that by prolonging life more people reach the cancerous age, for it is a disease of middle and past middle life. These considerations bring us face to face with what seems a discouraging truth--and that is that nature seems to be subtly trying to undo much of the work of modern medical science. In the merciful work of prolonging life are we providing cancer with more abundant soil? The cause of the disease has been the world-old riddle of medical science and the endless search for a cancer parasite is known to all. Not until investigators directed their efforts toward animal experiments did our present knowledge of the disease begin to take on definite valuable, usable form. White mice and white rats furnish the foundation for this work. If the...
